Each month we see significant improvements for certain customers. One customer in particular has made strides over time and recently had a performance spike. So we asked the fleet manager, who oversees their fleet, what he attributed these improvements to.

He has multiple locations for his business, so it's not as simple as frequently holding a local driver meeting. He informed us that he displays his Drivers' Scorecards on a bulletin board for every driver to see. The company clearly communicates their goals and expectations, then posts the results; not to mention, this promotes healthy competition and potentially opens conversations between drivers to coach one another and share advice.

If you and your team are not seeing expected results due to the inability to find time to coach specific drivers, maybe this idea could help trigger some competition with your drivers as well.

Thanks to our valued partners, for sharing your tips for success!
